Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of self-reported depression between men and women who had been exposed to violence by intimate partners. Data from the National Longitudinal Study of Women's Health are used. Results show that among women who reported exposure to violence by their current or former partner, those who also reported depression were more likely than nondepressed women to report exposure to physical, sexual, and psychological violence. These findings suggest that exposure to violence by intimate partners may be related to depression.
